i study the effectiveness of education policies and programs to improve academic achievement and attainment among underserved students in the k 12 education pipeline in three different country contexts my first paper investigates the role of information in strengthening local governance of schools in punjab pakistan my second paper is a study of distributional effects of a literacy intervention targeted at schools parents and communities in a rural district in rwanda my third paper is an analysis of math course taking patterns among high school students in california u s a all three papers use large scale administrative and survey datasets and a combination of quasi experimental methods and descriptive data analyses to study policies and programs that directly address issues of access and learning for disadvantaged students my first paper studies the school council mobilization program scmp in punjab pakistan the scmp is an information dissemination program through which the provincial government made regular and targeted phone calls to local governance institutions in education school councils comprised of parents teachers and community members the calls informed and encouraged members to utilize a budget provided by the government to improve school and student outcomes using multiple administrative datasets and a difference in differences quasi experimental research strategy i find that scmp schools as a result of the outreach program increased expenditure by 40 percent i e roughly usd 100 per year per school compared to non scmp schools however facilities did not improve and additional contract teachers were not hired outcomes on which members were encouraged to spend the money worse students in scmp schools scored lower in math english and urdu by approximately one tenth of a standard deviation than students in non scmp schools i speculate that mobilizing councils may have interfered with the time and effort teachers put in the classroom and hence made schooling worse off for students from a policy perspective while scmp was a low cost scalable and successful program in terms of optics for the government and donor agencies education reforms in similar contexts have to be drastically re imagined if learning is what we ultimately care about for my second paper i investigate how a clustered randomized control trial in rwanda that was intended to encourage effective classroom reading pedagogy and engage students families and communities in reading activities outside of school impacted students reading along different points of the reading achievement distribution using a quantile treatment effects research strategy i find that the set of interventions had no impact on students at the top 90th or bottom 10th percentiles of kinyarwanda fluency and text comprehension distributions and girls were the only beneficiaries of the program moreover the treatment arm that focused on changing pedagogical practices in school benefited girls who were struggling to read but the treatment arm that focused on engaging families and communities along with introducing effective pedagogical practices in school benefited girls who were already at an advantage in reading i consider the response to the interventions by students parents and teachers within the cultural context of rwanda which helps explain the disparate findings along the reading distributions my work underscores the importance of tailoring programs to the needs of different types of learners and considering whom exactly the program benefits when scaling up finally for my last paper i explore the patterns in mathematics course taking among california public high school seniors across demographic and school characteristics i find that although a large majority of college bound students enroll in math in their final year of high school high school seniors do not equally access advanced math pathways latinx african american and low income students are underrepresented in math courses in high schools and in the applicant pool data for post secondary institutions similarly high poverty schools have a smaller percentage of students enrolled in advanced math courses compared to low poverty schools in 12th grade these disparities at the individual and school level directly impact students post secondary outcomes such as the likelihood of applying to and enrolling in college my work directly responds to the california state university system s proposed policy that would require students to complete a fourth year of math for college entry i argue that the additional requirements may pose barriers for students who are either discouraged by an additional step in the highly structured high school curriculum or are simply unable to access advanced courses together these three papers contribute to the literature on the effectiveness of education programs and interventions and inform our understanding of what works and what does not work in improving educational access and outcomes for disadvantaged students in three different country contexts these papers also provide direct guidance on how policies in environments like pakistan rwanda and the united states can be designed to maximize the impact for the most vulnerable student populations
